

New College Library Benefactors' Book 1611-1615

In issue 9 of New College Notes, William Poole published an edition of New College Library's Benefactors' Book for the years 1601-1610. The value of donation records for studying college libraries in the seventeenth century was laid out in that article: the libraries at this time relied heavily on donations, rather than purchases, to acquire books, and so gift registers are key to researching their early modern holdings. Although work has been done to add provenance details to copy-specific information on Search Oxford Libraries Online (SOLO), the full description of the gifts presented in the Benefactors' Book had only been available by consulting the register in person. Much of the information contained in the register cannot be represented on SOLO, such as clues for identifying the donor, an overall sense of donations coming in at a particular time, and, most importantly, the titles of books given that are no longer present in the collection.

The period covered by this instalment is the five years following on from that article. In 1617, the donation by Arthur Lake of several hundred volumes, which provided the impetus for making the register, swelled the number of books received between 1616-1620 considerably. The second half of the decade, then, will be covered in another instalment. Signs of the Lake family's involvement with the college are nonetheless visible in the donations from 1611-1615, albeit not in the figure of Arthur Lake himself. His brother Sir Thomas Lake's gift of 1614 included an 18-volume edition of Thomas Aquinas' works, and in 1613 Thomas Lake's two sons jointly donated Sir Henry Savile's 8-volume edition of John Chrysostom's works in Greek, newly printed at Eton. The impetus for the sons' gift may have been the award of their BAs—having matriculated at New College together in 1610, they likewise received their BAs together in February 1613 from Hart Hall.<sup>1</sup> Whatever the immediate occasion, the overall impression of these gifts is of a family carefully tending their relationship with the college around the time that Arthur Lake became warden (1613), as might be expected.

The dates of the previous section of the edition were chosen because of the increased intellectual activity of the college at this time, coinciding with renewed care for and investment in the library. Records of expenditure for the subsequent five years show that renovation work to provide accommodation for an expanding print collection was ongoing. In 1613, for instance, the college paid £10 for two and a half stalls and, in 1614, £7 for 11 yards of iron work and desks. Alongside this, money was spent in maintaining the collection, including for mending globes in 1612, and for mending two volumes by Gregorio de Valencia in early 1616. There were frequent costs for chaining what were presumably newly acquired books. In general, the expenses are of the kind also found between 1601 and 1610, but a pertinent difference for the five years covered in this section is in the presence of books bought specifically for the library.<sup>2</sup> No mention is made of the motivation of such purchases and it is possible that they were the result of a monetary donation rather than an allocation of college funds to new acquisitions. Either way, they provide useful contextual material to help determine whether the books chosen by donors reflected the needs perceived by the library.

As further work is done to make the Benefactors' Book available in this format, it will be possible to trace broader patterns of the library's development over time, but I hope that this small section will be a useful contribution to that endeavour.

Format

The Benefactors' Book is here laid out according to the form described by William Poole in his edition of the 1601-1610 gifts.<sup>3</sup> Further information, including typographical information, can be found in that article, but a brief outline will be given here. The entry from the Benefactors' Book is followed by a summary of the benefactor's biography; bibliographic information of the book given; the shelfmark and a short physical description of the book if it is still held by New College Library; and the total number of colleges which record this edition as being in their collection on SOLO.<sup>4</sup> Entries from the Benefactors' Book are interspersed with information on library expenses for the relevant year, which are recorded under the heading 'custus librariæ' in the college accounts. Where these accounts are given in English, modern spelling has been used. As for the previous decade, this information was duplicated from the college long books to the formal rolls created at the end of the financial year; this edition only uses the rolls where the long books are no longer present.

An amendment to the model provided by William Poole has been made to allow for the identification of books mentioned in the New College accounts under 'custus librariæ'. Those accounts which mention books by name (i.e. 1613, 1615 and 1616) have been followed by a section giving further information. The book description given in the 'custus librariæ' is repeated in quotation marks, below this and indented is provided bibliographical information of the book, and below this the shelfmark of the item where it survives in the library, also indented. Since these purchases are not the subject of this edition, further information on physical volumes has not been included.

This article also seeks to provide some detail on the bindings of the books, identifying tools used in Oxford bindings where possible and noting the presence of printed waste used in endleaves. Such information may assist with identifying other volumes acquired at a similar time, or other volumes given by the same donor where their provenance is not recorded in the Benefactors' Book. References to binding tools are given according to the conventions used and recommended by David Pearson.<sup>5</sup> An asterisk is used when a tool is not reproduced in his Oxford Bookbinding.

I am grateful to William Poole and Alexandra Plane for their help and advice in preparing this continuation to the Benefactors' Book edition, and to Christopher Skelton-Foord and all of the Library and Archives staff for giving me the opportunity to carry out the project.
